

TAKE SIX: Elements of Good Storytelling

Living Inside Your Story The perspective of each story is told in first person using your own storytelling voice to narrate the tale. Through the story you share who you are, what you felt, and what this event or situation means for you in such a personal way that it acts as a “conduit” for viewers to engage in their own very real and EMOTIONAL JOURNEY.

Rather than a detached telling ABOUT this happening and that happening, viewers experience a connection through this story through YOU. Digital storytelling is shared through the heart NOT the head.

Unfolding Lessons Learned One of the most unique features of this specific digital storytelling style is the expectation that each story express a personal meaning or insight about how a particular event or situation touches you, your community or humanity. A good story has a point to make, a moral conclusion, a lesson learned or an understanding or wisdom gained. The author develops a personal connection to the story facts by answering “so what!” Each story needs to have a point that is revealed in the end either implicitly with the media or stated explicitly with words on how the topic matters. The lesson learned is the “spine” that holds the entire story together!

Developing Creative Tension A good story has holding power created using intrigue or tension around a situation that is posed at the beginning of the story and resolved at the end sometimes with an unexpected twist. A compelling hook is created to intentionally draw the viewer into wondering how it will unfold and how will it all end. What does the title mean?

Who is that little girl? Will happen to the fish? What does the young girl discover when she leaves home? Does Amber ever have friends? What is the meaning of having a life without a father? The tension of an unresolved or curious situation engages and holds the viewer until reaching a memorable end. Pacing is an invisible part of sustaining story tension as we know so well from the era of Hitchcock films. Pacing unfolds what will happen next and wondering how IT will be resolved. Viewers always enjoy a surprise turn-of-events as long as a few clues are tucked into the storyline.

Economizing the Story Told A good story has a destination – a point to make –and seeks the shortest path to its destination. Each digital story is no more than 3-5 minute based on a written script that is no more than one (1) page or five hundred (500) words. The art of shortening a story lies in preserving the essence of the tale—using the fewest words along with images and sound to make your point. By holding clarity about the essence of the story, the additional narrative that would normally be part of storytelling can be pared down.

Showing Not Telling Good stories use vivid details to reveal feelings and information rather than just saying something was tall, happy, scary, or difficult to do. It was a dark and stormy night does not have to be said in the script. Unlike traditional oral or written stories, images, sound and music can be used to show a part of the context, create setting, give story information and provide emotional meaning not provided by words. Both words and media need to reveal through details rather than be named or simply stated.

Developing Craftsmanship A good story incorporates technology in artful ways demonstrating craftsmanship in communicating with images, sound, voice, color, white space, animations, design, transitions, and special effects. All media elements are selected to illuminate the meaning of the tale rather being bells and whistles that become distracting, overused or misused or simply used to illustrate what is being presented. Good craftsmanship creatively combines media elements to convey significant meaning rather than being used as “decoration” the story. Ask if your media resources are decorating, illustrating or illuminating?
